Historical Note

The National Forest Products Association (NFPA), known until 1965 as the National Lumber Manufacturers Association (NLMA), serves as the national spokesman for federated trade associations whose memberships comprises major regions, species, and products of the lumber and plywood industry in the United States. The national organization is financed by dues paid by the federated associations and by direct member companies. Members are represented on the board of directors by votes in proportion to the amount of dues paid, except that every federated association member has at least one seat on the board. The NFPA executive committee is comprised of representatives of those members.

Each of the basic activities of NFPA is assigned to a committee of the board of directors, and each such committee is supported by a staff department. Generally, the basic activities and services of NFPA and its predecessor NLMA have included forest conservation, research, public relations, statistical information, utilization and waste prevention, transportation, law information, governmental relations, lobbying, standardization of products and terminology, trade promotion, engineering, insurance, credit rating services, and administration.

To encourage public support during the Great Depression of the 1930s, NLMA established a publicity and trade promotion arm known as the American Forest Products Industries, Inc. (AFPI). The executive committee of NLMA served as the board of directors of AFPI, while the chairman of the NLMA trade promotion committee was AFPI president. The Timber Engineering Company (TECO) was established in 1932 as a subsidiary of AFPI to promote the use of lumber in engineering construction. In 1946, AFPI became an independent organization and was renamed American Forest Institute (AFI) in 1967.

In 1943, NLMA joined with the two other national trade associations concerned with forest industries, the American Paper and Pulp Association and American Pulpwood Association, to form the Forest Industries Council (FIC), which discusses and makes recommendations concerning the joint interests of its members, although its actions are not binding on the member institutions. The chief elected and executive officers of the member associations hold seats on the FIC, which was later expanded to include AFI and the American Plywood Association.

In 1992, NFPA merged with the American Forest Council and the American Paper Institute to become the American Forest and Paper Association.
